

#73 Double Her Double – The 4th Double: Both Prussia (which we can view as Germany) and Austria were defeated by Napoleon in 1806

The Hohenzollerns and Prussia. Of the various German states (and in this context we are not including the Austrian Empire as a German state), Prussia would become the most powerful. It would be Prussia that would unite the rest of the German states together into what we now know as modern Germany. Prussia was militaristic. Prussia led Germany into what it was to such a degree that people often simply referred to the Germans as the Prussians. The Prussians were led by the Hohenzollern dynasty. The Prussians were powerful in the 150 years leading up to Napoleon, and after the time of Napoleon, for they would unite the German states into Germany in 1871, soon leading all Germans to fight in World War I and World War II.

The dualism of Austria and Germany.

By this time, we see that Austria and Germany had a well recognized dualism as concerns the Holy Roman Empire. It is easy to see this dualism, for the First Reich of the Holy Roman Empire that Napoleon ended in 1806 had the Austrian Empire's Habsburgs as its rulers, yet when Hitler formed the German Third Reich, he was looking back at the German roots of that same First Reich of the Holy Roman Empire. The main point of this particular discussion is to understand that Napoleon defeated both the Prussians (Germans) and Austrians in 1806.

The Kingdom of Prussia at its greatest extent, at the time of the formation of the German Empire, 1871

Key Understanding: Both Prussia and Austria were defeated by Napoleon in 1806. Napoleon defeated the powerful Prussians (the leading German state) in 1806, and also forced the ending of the Austrian-led Holy Roman Empire in 1806.
