Roosevelt's Four Freedoms

Key Understanding: The Four Freedoms and the Atlantic Charter. The January 6, 1941, Four Freedoms were purposely and substantially incorporated into the August 14, 1941, Atlantic Charter.

Following are three samples – (a), (b), and (c) – from the many sources that convey the proper understanding that the Four Freedoms were substantially incorporated into the Atlantic Charter.

- Sample (a) – In a January 1941 address to Congress, he [President Franklin D. Roosevelt] looked forward to “a world founded upon four essential human freedoms”: freedom of speech and of religious worship and freedom from want and from fear. Pursuit of these Four Freedoms was incorporated months later into the Atlantic Charter, an informal proclamation of shared purpose in the face of Nazi tyranny issued by Roosevelt and Winston Churchill.
- Sample (b) – In his message to Congress proposing lend-lease legislation (Jan. 6, 1941), President Franklin Delano Roosevelt stated that Four Freedoms should prevail everywhere in the world – freedom of speech and expression, freedom of worship, freedom from want, and freedom from fear. These were substantially incorporated (Aug., 1941) [into] the Atlantic Charter.
- Sample (c) – Several months after delivering the [State of the Union] speech, FDR and Winston Churchill, the British Prime Minister, met on the high seas. They forged a document entitled the Atlantic Charter that contained the promise of the Four Freedoms . . . Twenty-six allied nations went on to endorse the Atlantic Charter in a document, the ‘Declaration by the United Nations,’ on January 1, 1942, and the Four Freedoms proved to be a popular wartime slogan for the duration of the conflict.
