Key Understanding: Great Britain’s anti-Jewish role of November 9, 1938. On November 9, 1938, the date that Kristallnacht would erupt in Nazi Germany, instantly stimulating the desire in even more Jews to exodus en masse from Germany to the land of Palestine, the Woodhead Commission in Great Britain issued its report regarding the partition of Palestine between the Jews and Arabs, which would lead to the British policy of restricting Jewish emigration to Palestine.

Palestine history: 1922 - The British Mandate

The Mandate for Palestine, also known as the Mandate of Palestine or the British Mandate of Palestine, was a territory in the Middle East comprising modern day Jordan, Israel, and the West Bank and Gaza Strip, formerly belonging to the Ottoman Empire, which the League of Nations entrusted to the United Kingdom to administer in the aftermath of World War I as a Mandate Territory.

Before the end of World War I, Palestine was a part of the Ottoman Empire. The British, under General Edmund Allenby during the Arab Revolt stirred up by British intelligence officer T. E. Lawrence, defeated the Turkish forces in 1917 [and 1918] and occupied Palestine and Syria. The land was administered by the British for the remainder of the war. The British military administration ended starvation with the aid of food supplies from Egypt, successfully fought typhus and cholera epidemics, and significantly improved the water supply to Jerusalem. They reduced corruption by paying Arab and Jewish judges higher salaries. Communications were improved by new railway and telegraph lines.

The British had made promises concerning the future of Palestine to local Arabs through Lawrence of Arabia

The United Kingdom was granted control of Palestine by the Versailles Peace Conference which established the League of Nations in 1919, and appointed Herbert Samuel, a former Postmaster General in the British cabinet who was instrumental in drafting the Balfour Declaration, as its first High Commissioner in Palestine. During World War I, the British had made two promises regarding territory in the Middle East. Britain had promised the local Arabs, through Lawrence of Arabia, independence for a united Arab country covering most of the Arab Middle East in exchange for their support against the Ottomans; and Britain had promised to create and foster a Jewish national home in Palestine, as laid out in the Balfour Declaration, 1917.

The British had, in the Hussein-McMahon Correspondence, previously promised the Hashemite family lordship over most land in the region in return for their support in the Great Arab Revolt during World War I. In 1920 at the conference of San Remo, Italy, the League of Nations mandate over Palestine was assigned to Britain.

In June 1922 the League of Nations passed the Palestine Mandate. The Palestine Mandate was an explicit document regarding Britain's responsibilities and powers of administration in Palestine, responsibilities that included "securing the establishment of the Jewish national home," and "safeguarding the civil and religious rights of all the inhabitants of Palestine."
